

Interview with Derek Marshall

Derek describes the Rotary club as an opportunity to engage with the community and be a force for good, as well as a great way for his family to participate in service projects. Derek is married with five children and this has been a great way for his family to be involved in the community.

The club fills a gap outside the political or religious groups that dominate this area in Utah, serving as a safe and neutral space that brings together a diverse range of individuals

Derek has deeply cherished the opportunity to engage with people whose paths he might not have crossed through church or political affiliations alone, enriching his life in meaningful ways.

I couldn't help but notice his humility. Rather than highlighting his own generous contributions of time and services, he focused on how much the group has enriched his life. His modesty was clear, even as he has contributed not only his time, inspiring others to join the group and also contributing his resources and connections as an attorney. He hopes his children will get involved when they are older, having witnessed the significant impact the club has on both its members and the broader community.

Derek's personal goal is for the club to continue growing, but not to the point where it loses its close-knit atmosphere. He noted that his ancestors were farmers who owned orchards right here in Orem, and he finds it interesting to see how all of that has disappeared with the city's development, but growth doesn't mean a bad thing.

Derek's key points for all you need to get involved:

Willingness to Serve

Willingness to Learn

Willingness to Help
